Get Out Of Cars & Explore Director Urges

Serendipity National Park, anyone?

There is no such park, of course, but the word describes how one informed official thinks we should go exploring for new sights, new sounds and experiences in the parks we visit.

George B. Hartzog, Jr., director of the National Park Service, suggests that park visitors get out of their automobiles and discover for themselves what lies away from the roadsides.

That's where the word serendipity comes in, it means finding something far more useful or delightful than what you started out to look for.

"The sense of history at a hallowed shrine, or the feeling of wonder in a vista of scenic splendor, may well be lost by those who seek to absorb it through the tinted windows of their automobiles," Harzog said.

"We all need to take more time these days to experience the delights of nature in parklands and waters where man is at peace with his environment."

The 280 various natural, historical and recreational areas in the Department of the Interior's National Park System are preparing for an estimated 180 million visits in 1971.
